These toxins share a common mechanism of action, via inactivation of particular protein function through interaction with zinc-dependent metalloproteases, called metalloproteases or adamalysins. Snake venom metalloproteases are classified as metalloproteases associated with specific functions, e.g., via their ability to inactivate specific target proteins. Snake venom metalloproteases have been shown to have a wide range of substrate specificities. These toxins can be classified into one of three classes: 1) the disintegrins, which target the RGD domain in fibronectin, a critical adhesion component of the integrin receptor for collagen and other adhesive proteins; 2) the waprins, which target β -amyloid precursor protein (APP) and γ -secretase, inhibitors of both pathways for the cleavage of the amyloid precursor protein (APPS) and for generating amyloid peptides that trigger AD plaque formation; and 3) the C-type lectin-like proteins, which kill target cells via non-enzymatic interactions. Snake venom metalloproteases have been shown to have both pro-tumorigenic and anti-tumorigenic activity. For example, 6d1f23a050
